2015 Forbes Healthcare Summit   Brent Saunders Q&A Transcript

Q: Ironically, some years ago, Pfizer decided to scale down the breadth of what it worked on to focus on key areas. Interestingly enough, the initiative which was lead at the time by the head of sales and marketing, your new colleague, Ian Read, actually got out of the things that Allergan works on, dermatology, ophthalmology, aesthetics, GI and stuff. What will happen in the new organization with regards to these areas that you obviously care about?

A: Why Pfizer bought Allergan, in large part, was because of the strong leadership positions we have in those therapeutic areas. And it's not just the current portfolio products that are being marketed and sold in various countries around the globe, it's also the pipeline that sits behind those and the sustainability of that leadership position. And I know with absolute certainty that when the deal is consummated, we fully intend to support those therapeutic categories, stay in those therapeutic areas, do R&D in those therapeutic areas and strive to maintain number one or number two positions in each one of those and take it around the world and not just the 60 countries that we operate in.

So I think they're going to do well. There are areas like dermatology where we are a market leader where we benefit from Pfizer's R&D. As you know they are quite adept at JAK inhibitors, there could be a nice application in dermatology there. We don't have that capability so that's a win-win. In GI, the JAK inhibitors could work in inflammatory bowel disease. So I think there's a real opportunity. We'll continue R&D in Irvine in aesthetic medicine and Botox and neurotoxin. We'll continue to do development around new molecules for glaucoma or dry eye and other disease of the eye in Irvine. There could also be application from some of the oncology research in ophthalmology, so I think there will be an even stronger commitment to some of these areas and better science that could become solutions to that need in the future.
