Pro-Innovation

This industry is going through fundamental core changes:

Technology and infrastructure think fiber and 5G

What consumers do with that technology everything is moving to video

The way they obtain content

How they consume content on demand, on the go

To meet evolving consumer needs we are seeing compression of the value chain across the industry Netflix is producing its own programming; some content is offered direct to consumer online, etc. That's great news for consumers because with integration across the value chain you can move more quickly, you can experiment and innovate and deliver attractive new offers.

That's exactly what we are doing with this transaction. This is a vertical merger that will spur innovation and investment.

This transaction is all about unlocking video rights and giving consumers what they want. Together, we can create exciting new ways for consumers to experience video anytime, anywhere, on any device, with a level of customization and interactivity never experienced before.

We know that consumer are looking for something new in video, something that is more interactive, immersive, multi-user and integrated with user-generated content. But we just can't provide that if we have to negotiate new content rights with every change in the market. The bargaining friction just does not allow us to be nimble enough to keep up with consumers and technology.

The acquisition of TW's content will allow us, however, to create the next wave of innovative OTT content that is original and interactive. Once we innovate with West's content others will want to make sure their content has the same features

Pro-Competition

DIRECTV gave us the video distribution scale necessary to compete with Comcast and now Charter and allowed us to build more fiber but not everywhere. Those economics are still difficult

Through that deal, we were able to combine our mobile platform with DIRECTV's video distribution to create new products and services that consumers want

Those moves have had an impact: cable has moved into mobile in order to keep up with us they see where this is going as well and that's good

But these companies are vertically integrated

Comcast has NBC Universal

Charter is owned in part by John Malone who also owns content through Liberty Media

The Comcast conditions expire in 2018

The new products and services created as a result of this acquisition will speed and spur the demand that will support faster deployment and adoption of 5G which in turn will provide another competitive alternative to cable broadband across the country in places where the economics for fiber are challenging

Our ability to own content will make us a more formidable competitor to those companies giving consumers more choices, new products and services, and a real alternative to the cable's broadband dominance
