Comcast and Time Warner Cable to Present Consumer Benefits to Congress

By David L. Cohen, Executive Vice President, Comcast Corporation

Today, following our recent filing of our Hart-Scott-Rodino notification with the Department of Justice and our filing at the FCC of our Public Interest Statement, I will testify before the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee as we start to make the public interest case for our transaction with Time Warner Cable. I plan to outline for the Committee the many ways that the proposed transaction to combine Time Warner Cable with Comcast will benefit millions of Americans.

At the hearing, I'll be joined by Time Warner Cable CFO Artie Minson and other witnesses, including Back9Network CEO James Bosworth, Public Knowledge President Gene Kimmelman, SpotOn Networks CEO Dick Sherwin, and University of Pennsylvania Law School Professor Christopher Yoo. You can watch the hearing live on the committee's website, on C-SPAN3 TV, and c-span.org.

Today, traditional boundaries between media, communications, and technology companies are rapidly becoming obsolete. The competitive ecosystem in which we operate includes companies with national and global footprints – like AT&T, Verizon, DirecTV, DISH, Netflix, Amazon, Apple, Sony, Google, and Facebook – all of whom are competing with each other, and with us, in unprecedented ways – and all to the benefit of consumers. This transaction will give our company the scale that will enable us to make larger investments in R&D, innovation, and infrastructure, so we can compete more effectively in this incredibly dynamic marketplace. And when we invest, our competitors will be spurred to invest, too, benefiting even more Americans. In fact, many of them have already announced their plans to expand investment in response to our proposed transaction.

Our investment will bring Time Warner Cable customers faster Internet speeds, more programming choices, next-generation TV, and more robust Wi-Fi. These aren't just empty promises. We have a proven record of investing billions in new technologies and networks. We're leaders in high speed internet – and with today's Internet speed announcement, we've increased the speed of our high speed data service 13 times in 12 years. We carry more than 160 independent networks and we committed to launch 10 new independent cable channels in 2011, eight of which were to be minority owned (five of these ten networks have already launched). We're making the future of TV a reality with our acclaimed X1 entertainment operating system and our recent launch of cloud DVR. We have the fastest in-home Wifi to power the next generation of entertainment, and we just announced the deployment of more than a million Wi-Fi hotspots coast to coast. Business customers will also benefit from a stronger new entrant offering more choice and better prices.

This transaction will also lead to substantial benefits for the broader American public. In the last two and a half years, Comcast has connected over 1.2 million low-income people to the Internet through our acclaimed Internet Essentials program. We've committed to extend that program to all Time Warner Cable communities – meaning we'll be fighting the digital divide in 19 of the nation's 20 largest cities. Additionally, Comcast is currently the only ISP legally bound by full Net Neutrality rules. This transaction will extend our commitment to millions of Time Warner Cable customers in cities from New York to Los Angeles.

Understandably, even with all of these compelling benefits, we expect some of the witnesses to raise questions about our companies combining. While we respect their opinions, the facts just don't support the concerns they have raised.

This transaction will not lead to any reduction in competition or consumer choice in any market. Our companies serve separate and distinct geographic areas. We don't compete for customers anywhere. We will not have undue power in negotiating with program networks, and we have a great record of working with programmers from the largest to the smallest.

When Comcast has promised to deliver competitive and public interest benefits in past transactions, we didn't just keep our promises – we over-delivered. If this transaction is approved, we'll do so again.

This transaction will allow us to build a better Comcast for millions of Americans. I look forward to presenting the numerous pro-consumer, pro-competitive benefits of our transaction and addressing questions from the Committee members.
